This historic book may have numerous typos, missing text or index. Purchasers can download a free scanned copy of the original book (without typos) from the publisher. 1919. Not illustrated. Excerpt: ... The history of capital punishment in the United States may be concluded with a resume of the situation at the present time. There are now ten states in which the death penalty has been completely abolished, and two others in which it is retained only for the crime of treason, so that they may fairly be included with the former. These states are as follows: states where capital punishment is abolished (1) Treason is punishable by death. (2) There have been no executions in Kansas since 1872. (3) In 1882 the death penalty was re-established in Maine but abolished again in 1887. (4) A convict, serving a life term for murder, upon conviction of a murderous attack upon a guard or keeper, can be condemned to death. (5) There were only three executions in Wisconsin prior to abolition of capital punishment. Capital punishment is retained in thirty-six states. All of them punish the crime of murder in the first degree with death. But in only twelve of them is the death penalty arbitrarily imposed on all persons convicted of this crime. The other twenty-five give to the jury or the court, (in nearly every case it is the jury) power to fix the sentence at either death or life imprisonment. Twelve states apply the death penalty to only one offense, nine to two offenses, and the other fourteen to three or more. After murder in the first degree, rape is the crime for which the death penalty is most often inflicted. This is particularly true in the southern states, where the commission of this offense by negroes upon white women is regarded with especial indignation by the whites, and which they accordingly treat with severity. Arson, especially of an inhabited dwelling in the night time, is still a capital offense in a number of the states, as is also treason. Robbery and bu...
