With all of the recent recalls made for commercial dog food brands, you are right to worry about the health and nutrition of your dog. Unfortunately, many people do not take this aspect of dog ownership seriously and their dogs end up sick or malnourished. Choosing a commercial dog food brand can be difficult because there are so many options to choose from and because there are so many low-quality brands out there. This is one of the many reasons that modern dog owners are switching to homemade dog food.

Before you make the switch to homemade dog food for your pup you would be wise to learn as much as you can about dog nutrition. It isn't enough to simply mix up some raw meat, vegetables and eggs then feed it to your dog. Dog nutrition is very complex and if you aren't careful, you could end up leaving some key nutrients out of your dog's diet without even realizing it. It is also important to realize that making a well-balanced homemade dog food can be very challenging. This is why you need to start with a recipe that has been approved by a veterinarian or animal nutritionist to ensure that it will meet your dog's nutritional needs. If you are curious to try homemade dog food for yourself, or if you simply want to learn more about dog nutrition, this book is the perfect place to start. In this book you will receive an overview of dog nutrition including the top three most important nutrients as well as a list of key vitamins and minerals. You will also receive a list of benefits associated with homemade dog food in addition to some drawbacks you need to consider. If you decide that you want to try out homemade dog food, you will also find a collection of recipes for dog food and treats. So, if you are ready to learn more about dog nutrition, turn the page and keep reading!
